The Dead Hope. Fast fell the night; low moan'd the wind which From where, beyond the hills, the shadows crept
Up the dim sky, and far, on land and sea,
The storm's dark spirits gathered wild and free.
All nature felt the spell which, deepening down,
Closed hill and vale and city, in its frown,
And shuddering, hash'd her noises in the gloom,
And bow'd before the tempest and its doom.

Far from the bappy haun's of busy men.
Through many a shadow'd path and cloister'd glen.
Across dim spaces where the tempest's winz:
Swept low and blurred the face of everything,
By many a ruin, stark and gray and wan,
By many a spot some curse seem'd resting on,
I rode into the storm's advancing pall,
I rode into the storm's advancing pall. And felt its presence dark'ning over al. !

What time my steed's sharp step no longer broke The night's weird hush I know not; but there woke From a low, rutnons wall beside the way A sound that caus'd both steed and heart to stay. There sate a form bow'd down, though not with

Whose cheeks were worn by no unmanly tears, Whose garb was old and patch'd, and yet whose For lack of cheer, still lack'd no knightly grace!

Pitv my senses andden'd, and my tongue,
Though firs: its accents in confusion hung.
Made the swift tender of respect and aid.
And ask'd him wherefore in the storm he stay'd.
"Come, friend, benighted and distressed," I said,
"And seek a sheiter from the blast o'er head";
He answer'd me with silence and with grief,
To which no words nor tears did give reitef.

"What sorrow thus thy life has overcast?
What spectre haunts thee from the buried past?
Why seek the darkness and the tomb for cheer.
And leave behind what'er the world deems dear?
At last his bended head arose, and dim
His eyes look'a out, beyond the gray locks' rim;
His voice came low and thick—"My love is dead.
And with her death my heart and hope are fled."

"Yet come," I urg'd—"the night winds gather fast,
The ruin'd arches murmur in the blast:
The white tombs shine with a dim, spectral light—
Leave with me this dark cavern of the night."
And yet, in plainure tones, too sad to swell
Along the chords where grief's high notes do dwell,
He said, "I loved tair Hope, and she is fled;
There lies her grave—I would I too were dead."

And there, 'mid night and death, the mourner kept And there, 'mid night and death the mother key
His own sad vigil where his passion siept.
Deav to the world and deaf to human voice,
And living only with his beart's lost choice:
"I loved the beautiful Hope—and there she lies,
Rand by the grave's embraces from my eyes;
I loved her first and sole, and with her sped
My life's true his—1 would I too were dead!"

A WHITE MAN ASSAULTED BY A NEGRO AND FATALLY INJURED .- From a private letter received yesterday by our townsman, John H. Day, Esq., we learn the following particulars of a most dastardly attack by a negro upon a white man near Cherrystone, Eastern Shore of Virginia, which probably will result in the death of the latter: At 7 o'clock Monday evening, while Mr. John Chambers, a merchant doing business about four miles from Cherrystone, was seated in his store, a negro entered and asked him for 2 piece of tobacco. Mr. Chambers started to wait upon him, but just as he was turning around to go behind the counter the negro struck him a heavy blow upon the left temple with a billy, which he had kept concealed up to that time, felling him to the floor in an insensible condition. The injured man regained his consciousness some time during the night, but was unable to help himself, and was found in that condition the next morning by some early customers. His money had not been taken, and none of his goods were missing, from which it is supposed that the negro, after the commission of the deed, became frightened from some cause, and fled without accomplishing his full purpose.

name, and only a very imperfect description of him. Up to the time that Mr. Day's correspondent wrote the negro had not been captured; neither had any clew to him been obtained. It was thought by the attendant physician that Mr. Chambers's injuries would result fatally.—Norfolk Landmark.

The Letter and Spirit of the Law.

[From the Paris Galois.]

One pleasant night, in a lonely spot in the Faubourg du Temple, a pedestrian was halted by a robber who threatened to kill him unless he voluntarily subscribed to the campaign fund. The pedestrian calmiy drew a pistol from his pocket, and placing it to the highwayman's head, marched him to the nearest police station, where he gave him in charge and told the story to the sergeant. "Very good," said that vigorous official; "and now have you a permit to carry a pistol?" "I have not." "In that case I shall be compelled to hold you on a charge of carrying concealed weapons."

"But if I hadn't had my pistol with me I would probably have been murdered."

"That is quite likely, but the law takes no cognizance of little things like that. The law is the law, and must be obeyed."

"Very well; but is there any ordinance had some concern the firm of the old concern.

E. COURTNEY JENKINS & CO., who assume all liabilities of the old concern.

E. COURTNEY JENKINS, C. L. STEGAL. charge of carrying concealed weapons." "Very well; but is there any ordinance against carrying a pistol that won't shoot?"

No; of course not." "Then if you will above noticed, I cheerfully commend the new firm of E. COURTNEY JENKINS & CO. to my old customer of E. COURTNEY JENKINS & CO. to my old customer of E. COURTNEY JENKINS & CO. be so good as to examine this deadly weapon you will perceive that there is no trigger to it. It is one a friend gave me to take to the armorer's and bave repaired." "Lemme go!" yelled the captive highwayman; "I was kidnapped and inveigled here under false pretences. This is a charge of fraud by a fraud." The vigilant sergeant was about as deeply disgusted.

Those Pennsylvanians who have been somewhat mortified by the very poor figure made by their representatives in the House during the recent debate possibly may find some consolation in the fact conveyed in a special dispatch from Norfolk, to the effect that in a chicken-fight in that city yesterday "the standard character of the Pennsylvapia chickens was so nobly sustained that they had the advantage in bets." This grand old State is not losing ground everywhere.- Philadelphia Bulletin.
